MUNICH MAYOR AND FORMER REFUGEES HONOR FRIEND OF JEWS WITH MEDAL AND U.S. TOUR

The Nazis threatened to send her to the Dachau concentration camp. Her husband was interrogated and spent four and a half months in Hitler's prisons. The Allies flew over on nightly bombing raids that left her without windows, gas, or electricity, says the New York Times. Still, Karoline Angermaier refused to abandon the Thalkirchner cemetery where Munich Jews were buried by her family since 1816, and possibly before.

When the first Jews were being killed at Dachau, near Munich, the Nazis sent their sealed coffins to the cemetery for burial. But Mrs. Angermaier opened them up and washed the bodies in accordance with Jewish ritual, although she is a Catholic.

Recently, a wrinkled but bubbly seventy-year-old Mrs. Angermaier, her blue eyes shining as brightly as the silver medal around her neck, sat in her bedroom at the Manger-Windsor Hotel, in New York, ready for a tour of the United States paid for by grateful former refugees and the Mayor of Munich.

The medal, larger than a silver dollar, reads: "Muenchen Leuchtet Den Freundon Muenchens," which, freely translated, means "Munich lights a candle for the friend of Munich."

But she was no friend of the city three decades ago when the Nazis proclaimed it as their birthplace. Mrs. Angermaier and her husband had taken over care of the 6,000-plot Jewish cemetery in 1927. In 1942, it was ordered closed by the Gestapo, as the Nazis intended to turn it into a public park.

"When any Jews came to visit the graves," she said in German (she speaks not a word of English), "I had immediately to call the Gestapo and report them," reports the New York Times. The police got no calls from her.

That same year, a collection crew of ten Jews from a forced-labor camp came to the cemetery with hammers and chisels to remove metal parts of the monuments for contributions to the war effort.

She fed them and then carefully noted in the cemetery ledger the license plates of the trucks that carried the parts away. After the war, what was left of the Jewish community was able to trace and recover the parts that were not melted.

In 1943, the Nazis drew up "contracts" purporting to show the "sale" of the tombstones to stone masons. Mrs. Angermaier again kept a careful check.

"The Nazis knew I wasn't on their side," she said, "but I never did anything directly against their orders. When they told me to join a Nazi women's organization I told them I had no time."

Mayor Hans-Jocken Vogel took the occasion of her seventieth birthday last June to present her with the medal, 300 marks ($75), a book, and the promise to fill any wish she had.

She asked to be excused from the city ordinance to shovel the snow in front of the cemetery and the Mayor promptly turned the job over to a private agency.

Meanwhile, some other money was sent to her by grateful Germans and refugees. With the 2000 marks ($500), and at the urging of her son, says the New York Times, joined the city's university charter flight to New York and a tour as far west as Chicago.

War Writer Was Counsel To French Embassy; In Legion Of Honor

Joseph M. Levy, former New York Times war correspondent in the Middle East, died of a cerebral hemorrhage in the New York Hospital. He was sixty-four years old and lived at 461 West End Avenue.

Mr. Levy, after retiring from The Times in 1947, served as public relations counsel to the French Embassy in Washington, says the New York Times. More recently he had been a press liaison representative of the House Judiciary Committee.

Mr. Levy was fluent in eight languages, including Hebrew and Arabic. Born in New Brunswick, N.J., he was taken to Jerusalem as an infant. He attended the University of Beirut.

As a young man he served as private and political secretary to Sir Ronald Storrs, Governor of Jerusalem under the British mandate. In his twenties, he spent seven months with a Bedouin tribe in the Transjordan desert, studying its customs.

He was engaged by The Times as a foreign correspondent in 1928 and made his headquarters in Jerusalem. The following year his articles about Arab outbreaks against the Jews and the British in Palestine began to appear.

From 1936 on, he was more frequently based in Cairo. He made excursions to Damascus, Baghdad, and Amman as the news required. Many of his stories were about archeological discoveries, economics and peaceful pursuits.

Increasingly his work dealt with riots, combat, and war. In 1940 he reported the Royal Air Force strikes at Italian Africa, and, with the British forces in the Western Desert, covered Anglo-Italian hostilities. In 1941-42 he reported the back-and-forth movement of the North African battle.

In 1943 he left Cairo, because of ill health, and was assigned to An-

Helena Rubinstein, World Cosmetics Tycoon, Lived To 94, Amassed Riches And Triumphs, Never Lost Touch With Genius, Remained Creative, Was Woman Beyond Compare

Helena Rubinstein, the multi-millionaire beauty expert and cosmetics manufacturer, died in New York Hospital, where she had been admitted several nights before. She was ninety-four years old and had been to a movie a week before. Her son, Roy Titus, chairman of the board of Helena Rubinstein, Inc., 655 Fifth Avenue, with total assets of $17.5 million, says the New York Times, will now direct her cosmetics empire, with factories salons and laboratories in fourteen countries.

Her nephew, Oscar Kolin, then executive vice president, and her niece, Mala Rubinstein, then vice-president in charge of creative activities, will assist him.

Miss Rubinstein, whose personal fortune has been estimated at more than $100 million, wrought more miracles from a jar of face cream than she ever dared to promise her clients. Through her cosmetics, she became a famous art collector, a Georgian Princess, one of the world's richest women and a tantalizing legend in America.

After forty-three years of persistent work, the Polish-born tycoon never lost interest or enthusiasm in the products that bore her name, 110 in the United States, and more than 1,000 throughout the world.

"I think I've put in 300 years of work in my time," she once said. And she expected her employes to show the same ferocious energy and drive that she did. The slackers did not last long and even the most dedicated and resourceful were expected to devote their lives [illegible]. Her working day [illegible].

"When Madame started pulling off her rings," a former employe recalled, "you knew that she was going to start pounding the table or the person in front of her." Her temper was startling, but so was her affection for employes who had served her well.

Several years ago, when a key executive left the company, Miss Rubinstein reportedly gave her a check for $100,000. At the moment of parting, Miss Rubinstein allegedly pulled off a ruby ring from her hand and slipped it on the woman's finger.

"I want my business to go on for 300 years after I have gone," she often said. The people she trusted with responsibility — and even they were eclipsed by her powerful personality and swift decisions — were members of her family. "She had strong tribal instincts," an acquaintance said, reports the New York Times. "When an employe once asked her to promote him to an important position, she looked horrified and said, 'How can I? We're not even related.'"

Despite her age — which she kept a secret — Madame, as her employes always called her, was intensely interested in keeping up with the times.

"Too old-fashioned! They look too old-fashioned!" she said scornfully in her office, only the week before she died, when new cosmetics advertisements were brought to her for approval.

Miss Rubinstein, a small woman — she was four feet, ten inches — used her hands and dark eyes to express herself. She spoke English with a thick accent.

"Madame never spoke any language very well — English, French, Yiddish, even Polish — but it never stopped her from being a genius," said a friend.

Words didn't fascinate her. She said that she loved playing bridge "because you don't have to speak." She would greet business associates with "What's new?" and expect them to tell her — fast.

Her imperious manner, her impatience and her courage did not change, even when three would-be hold-up men forced their way into Miss Rubinstein's 26-room penthouse at 625 Park Avenue, near 65th Street, one evening last May. After the men bound and gagged an elevator operator, a maid, a secretary and a houseboy, Miss Rubinstein, who had been sleeping, woke up and looked coldly at the man who entered her bedroom.

When he ordered her to open a safe, saying: "Give us the keys or we'll kill you," she made a typical retort.

"I'm an old woman," she snapped back, "You can kill me. I'm not going to let you rob me. Now get out."

The intruder ordered Miss Rubinstein out of bed and tied her to a chair while he looked for the keys to her safe. Miss Rubinstein, whose voice could always rise to a historic pitch, began to scream. The men left without taking anything.

Miss Rubinstein hated small talk and during the last years of her life complained of loneliness. She was often frugal about certain personal expenses, although her private art collection was valued at $1 million, says the New York Times. The woman who owned paintings by Picasso, Matisse, Renoir, Chagall, Dali, and Graham Sutherland carried her lunch in to work in a brown paper bag.

"If she heard the smallest sound in the kitchen when she was giving a dinner party," said a friend, "she would rush out to see if anything had been broken. She was just as upset over a cracked ten cent bowl as more expensive damage."

Close friends learned never to let Miss Rubinstein lose at bridge. Although she played for small stakes, a loss of fifty cents was said to make her sulk.

She was her own greatest asset in promoting Helena Rubinstein products. She became a figure of international glamour and even in her 94th year she worked hard to sustain that image. For years none of her advertisements in the United States appeared without a photograph of Miss Rubinstein in a chemical laboratory wearing a white coat and looking as though she had just discovered a cream that would really [illegible] wrinkles.

She bought her clothes at Balenciaga, Dior, and Yves St. Laurent in Paris, although fittings distressed her because her plump figure was not ideal for high fashion. There were moments when she could not be bothered with making an impression and during the later years of her life she held business meetings in the bedroom of her New York apartment.

"Madame always seemed to be wearing a $4.99 cotton nightgown," one former associate said.

Her bed, which had a lucite head and footboard that glowed with fluorescent lighting, was purchased for $6.75, which she considered a bargain.

She collected jewelry — some was once owned by Catherine of Russia and some was bought at bargain prices because the gems had flaws. The jewelry was valued at $1 million. It amused her to buy costume jewelery at 5-and-10 cent stores and wear it with her real stones, says the New York Times. Rubies fascinated her and she wore ruby-colored lipstick and nail polish to match them.

"She was geared to constant change," a friend said, "but her own habits were the same."

Miss Rubinstein persisted in over-eating -- raw fruits, vegetables, borscht and fried chicken were among her particular weaknesses — and she refused to change the style of her blue-black dyed hair, which she wore skimmed back in a chignon.

As she grew older, and resented it, questions about her age irritated her fiercely. It was said that when Picasso once bluntly asked her how old she was, she gave him a cold stare and said:

"Older than you."

Age or fatigue never prevented her from continuing to run her business single-handedly or from going to the movies. The week before she died, she saw and was amused by "Goldfinger."

She continued to worry that her staff would not work hard enough or come up with new ideas, as she had for so long. A business associate recalled how more than ten years ago Miss Rubinstein used to address her employes with a stinging refrain:

"We are a house divided," he quoted her as saying, "business is terrible."

"Actually Madame used to make sure that we were really a house divided," he said. "She enjoyed it."

Miss Rubinstein, who was born in Cracow, Poland, was the eldest of eight daughters. Her moderately well-to-do parents were Horace and Augusta Silberfield Rubinstein. She attended the University of Cracow and studied medicine briefly in Zurich, Switzerland. By the time that she was eighteen she had abandoned a medical career and had discarded a suitor.

Her maternal aunts and uncles had migrated to Australia, where they were prospering as sheep ranchers. Australia, they wrote, was over-populated with eligible bachelors.

The Rubinsteins, who were slightly worried about their daughter's future, decided to send her to her family in Queensland, says the New York Times, who would see to it that she found a suitable husband.

Though disappointed in romance, Miss Rubinstein demonstrated her aptitude for practical thinking. She took along a jar of face cream that had always been supplied to the women in her family by a Hungarian physician.

When she arrived in Australia, she immediately noticed that the women's complexion looked rough and dried compared to her own. She wrote to Cracow and ordered a shipment of the cream. By 1908, she was said to have accumulated $100,000 in capital and had decided to start a business in Europe.

She was one of the first cosmetics dealers to realize that dry and oily skins should not be treated with the same products and she offered every client a personal skin analysis with every jar of cream.

After sailing for London in 1908, she was married to Edward Titus, an American newspaperman stationed in Melbourne, who had also left for London.

She opened a salon in Mayfair, hired a Viennese woman doctor (she always kept a woman doctor in attendance at her New York salon) and began making fabulous profits to add to the money that she was still reaping from her Australian enterprise. That operation was managed by her sisters, Ceska and Manka.

London gave Miss Rubinstein another great personal triumph. In 1908 she was named the best-dressed woman of the year and from then on she diligently followed fashion trends.

During World War I, Miss Rubinstein set her business sights on New York. In February, 1915, she opened a Maison de Beauté at 15 East 49th Street, says the New York Times. She decided to make America her life's work.

"I came in the winter," she once said, "The women all used dead-white powder. Their lips were gray. Their noses were red from the cold."

In 1909, Roy, her first boy, was born, and three years later, her second child, Horace, who was believed to have been her favorite, was born. Horace died in 1958.

Miss Rubinstein began to open beauty salons across the United States but she had formidable opposition. An equally uncanny woman who was also dealing in expensive and exotic cosmetics was already entrenched in Manhattan. Elizabeth Arden, her lifelong com-

★ CONGREGATION BNEI TORAH ★

Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits: This new congregation, the most northerly in Toronto, has been formed for the Bathurst-Finch-Steeles area, occupying premises at 19 Transwell Avenue, Willowdale, until a synagogue building, planned now, is ready for use, perhaps during the coming High Holiday season in September. Services are held every Friday evening, Sabbath morning, and afternoon. Rabbi Jakobovits conducts regular adult study groups in various Jewish subjects. Recently a nursery and kindergarten were opened for sessions every morning. Enrolment exceeded capacity and an afternoon session has been added. About five thousand Jews reside in the Willowdale area, of whom most have moved in only recently. Construction of new homes and apartments is proceeding at a rapid pace and a high proportion of these are being occupied by young Jewish families. Developers predict that the Jewish population north of Finch Avenue will quadruple within a few years. The first regular Jewish services in Willowdale were held in a private home exactly one year ago, and the congregation marked the first anniversary of his event at a celebration at which Rabbi Sholom Gold, principal of the Ner Israel Yeshiva College, was guest speaker. For further information contact Marvin Wenner, 222-4361.

WAR WRITER WAS COUNSEL TO FRENCH EMBASSY

kara, Turkey. From there he sent many stories of the effect of the war in the Balkans. After he retired from The Times, Mr. Levy worked privately and through organizations to help the Jews living in Arab countries outside Palestine.

As public relations counsel to the French Embassy he served Ambassadors Henri Bonnet, Maurice Couve de Murville, and Hervé Alphand, explaining the French point of view on international problems to Government leaders, says the New York Times. For his services he was made an officer of the French Legion of Honor.

He had been active in the American Jewish Committee and was a member of the Overseas Press Club and the Society for the Advancement of Judaism.

A Profile Of Australian Jewry On The Decline

By Aryeh Newman, of Israel, after a two-year mission for the Jewish Agency in Australia and New Zealand, writing in the Congress Bi-Weekly of the American Jewish Congress.

Australian Jewry, in spite of its growth in the postwar era, is still a small community and a comparatively young one. It numbers about 70,000, nearly 40,000 of whom, in the main survivors of the holocaust, arrived after 1947.

Jews, however, were present in Australia from the earliest days; the first white settlers, both the respectable pioneers and the prisoners transported to the penal colony, included Jews. Jews also figured among the gold-rush adventurers of the last century, establishing communities in places with such picturesque names as Ballarat and Bendigo.

The first "wave" — if we can call it that — of Jewish immigration to Australia consisted of Anglicized Jews who brought with them the patterns of the mother-country, adherence to a minimum of religious conformity and a Judaic respectability that made the least demands on their lives.

Divine service, the maintenance of a synagogue and a rabbi, were maximum aspirations which involved extraordinary efforts due to the isolation of the community. The learned layman was a rarity and any functionary, even with the most rudimentary Jewish knowledge, had to be brought from the old-country. No wonder then that Jewish observance and religious facilities were of the most rarified kind.

Those sufficiently concerned tried bravely to keep up the norms of Jewish existence, and applied to the Chief Rabbi in London for advice and help in procuring a rabbi and/or shochet. Intermarriage was rife from the very start. For the first few decades women, particularly of the respectable variety, were very scarce in the predominantly pioneering land.

This shortage was even more acute in the Jewish fold. Attempts were made to send out from England a group of girls to provide marriage partners, but the Melbourne congregation felt that the rough environment was still unsuitable.

The mass exodus of Russian Jewry from Tsarist persecution for the most part passed Australia by — much to the relief of both Gentile and Jew "down under." Russian Jews, said a member of the legislative assembly of the state of Victoria, were notorious for their Zionist sympathies and would not integrate in the new country. Russian Jews were not of the productive kind needed in the colony, ventured the representatives of the Jewish community in a letter to the Anglo-Jewish Association in London.

Needless to say, the chief sufferers were ultimately the Jewish communities of Australia, which were subject to the remorseless process of assimilation without benefit of the vitality injected into other communities by European immigration.

Jews indeed contributed prominently to the development of the country and individuals attained the highest offices in the land. Today, there are towns whose only traces of a Jewish community are a derelict synagogue building, and noticeable mentions in the telephone directory of Cohens, Levis, and Israels who have long since given up their ancestral connections. A courteous, ever-so-Australian Bellis will detachedly tell you that there is a Jew somewhere down the line in his family, unaware of the poignant Jewish historical associations of that name.

The first two decades of this century saw the arrival of refugees from Zionist persecution in Turkish Palestine, Russian Zionlovers, founders of colonies from Rishon Le-Zion to Metulleh, boarded supply ships at Alexandria returning to their home bases in Australia after bringing soldiers and supplies to the Middle East in the first world war.

Their first stop was Perth, and so there arrived in Australia, somewhat belatedly, those same Russian Jews or their children whose presence had been dreaded in an earlier epoch. Their numbers were small, but their impact can be felt to this day.

These Russian Jews brought with them a strong national and religious feeling that ultimately flowered, with the aid of subsequent immigrations, into the ramified educational amenities of present-day Melbourne, where the bulk of Australian Jewry is to be found.

Before 1948 there were some 30,000 Jews in Australia, mostly in Sydney. In the late 30's and early 40's sprinklings of German-Jewish refugees entered the country, reinforced by internees sent by the British government. The turning point in Australian Jewish history come with the mass influx of the immediate postwar years from East and Central Europe, the survivors of the Hitler terror.

The majority of these converged on Melbourne, doubling its Jewish population and making it in every way the leading Jewry of the Far East. Characteristically, they created their own institutions, from kindergartens upward.

The stimulus was given to providing an intense Jewish education for the young in a way that at first shocked the native Australian Jews — the establishment of all-day Jewish schools. The first attempt had been made in Sydney during the war years, but it had made little headway in an apathetic community.

The Anglo-Jewish "establishment" in Melbourne, led by their Chief Minister, at first opposed the very idea of a Jewish school (in contradistinction to Sunday school or "religious classes") as constituting undesirable segregation and an ungrateful response to the equal opportunities granted by a country so favorably disposed to the Jewish people. But the influence of the "establishment" no longer counted, and the school came into being.

Thus, the first Jewish all-day school in Melbourne — Mount Scopus College — was launched

Noted Rabbi Urged Eisenhower To Grant Clemency To Rosenbergs, Convicted Atom Spies

Dr. Abraham Cronbach, educator, author, religious leader and pacifist, died at the age of eighty-three years in Cincinnati, Ohio. Dr. Cronbach had served on the faculty of his alma mater, the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion, until he became professor emeritus of social studies.

He served Reform Jewish pulpits in South Bend, Ind.; New York City; and Akron, Ohio, and had been chaplain to the Chicago Federation of Synagogues. At his death he was rabbi emeritus of the Valley Temple in Cincinnati.

Dr. Cronbach's concern for social issues propelled him to the national spotlight in 1953. He was one of three clergymen who urged President Dwight D. Eisenhower to grant clemency to Ethel and Julius Rosenberg, convicted atom spies.

After the Rosenbergs' execution, Dr. Cronbach officiated at their funeral service. Speaking before a large crowd, Dr. Cronbach met angry murmurs of dissent when he pleaded for understanding of those who had carried out the death verdict.

"Our hardest task is to eschew hatred, to forsake rancor, and to keep our hearts clean of vindictiveness and retaliation," he said. "Let us not vituperate those who pronounced the verdict. Let us at least give them credit for this much: that they did what they thought was right."

Dr. Cronbach was a former vice-president of the National Council for Prevention of War and was honorary vice-president of the American Council for Judaism.

In "Judaism for Today," a book published in 1954 with a foreword by John Haynes Holmes, Dr. Cronbach proposed a religion similar to applied Quakerism, in which a conservative pacifism, with scrupulous sympathy and respect for others, would be an effective defense against aggression.

His other works were "A Psychoanalytic Study of Judaism," "Religion and its Social Setting," "The Bible and Our Social Outlook," "Autobiography"; and "Reform Movements in Judaism."

Dr. Cronbach is survived by his widow, Mrs. Rose Hentel Cronbach; their daughter, Marion, who is the wife of Rabbi Maurice Davis, of Indianapolis; and two grandsons.

Rabbi H. Leonard Poller, of Temple Beth Sholom, in Montreal, and Mrs. Poller, were friends of the Rabbi, and of Mrs. Cronbach; also friends here were the late George W. Cohen, founder-publisher of the Canadian Jewish Review, and Mrs. Cohen, present editor and publisher, whose marriage was solemnized by Dr. Cronbach when he was the Rabbi of Temple Israel in Akron, Ohio. Their daughter, Miss Suzann F. Cohen, who was taking a summer course at Macdonald College when the Rabbi came there to lecture, made herself his publicity agent and he was known on the campus as "Suzann's Rabbi."

in 1948 as a communal venture, the creation of the Board of Deputies which represented all shades of Jewish opinion. The school constitution was defined officially as "national" and "traditional." Indeed, the three school houses were named Hillel, Bialik, and Monash, symbolizing, in this order, the religious, national, and Australian aspects of community life. It succeeded beyond the founders' wildest dreams, growing within a decade or so to accommodating 1,500 children from the ages of four to fifteen. Its success encouraged the establishment of other schools.

Today, Melbourne has seven Jewish day-schools representing all nuances of the Jewish educational spectrum -- Lubavitch and Pressburg to secular Hebrew. Forty percent of all Jewish children attend these schools.

The focal point of Jewish life shifted from synagogue to school, from burial ground to nursery. Minimum norms of Jewish living were thus brought to the homes of hundreds of parents who were ignorant of them or had begun to ignore them.

The biggest problem of the schools is teaching staff; Australia has no teachers-training college. Israel has stepped into the breach and furnishes, on an official and unofficial basis, cadres of teachers, usually on short-term contracts of three years. Training of local talent, both in Australia and abroad, has not made much headway owing to Australia's high standard of living: teaching, as a profession, is the last choice on the Jewish parent's and student's list.

Acclimatisation is taking place very quickly. In spite of the Yiddish-speaking atmosphere of many homes, the new generation is indistinguishably Australian.

Many parents had blissfully imagined that the exposure of their child to 13 years of segregated Jewish schooling would immunize them against such influences once and for all — but the Jewish school has still not countered the dangers of intermarriage and ultimate assimilation ever present at the university level. For this reason communal leadership in Melbourne associated with Bnai Brith took the step of setting up a Hillel Foundation at the local universities and succeeded in attracting an American-trained rabbi to undertake the mission.

Adult education has received an impetus, too, from the activities of a special cultural officer sent by the Torah education department of the World Zionist Organization. Last summer saw the holding of the first all-Australian seminar in the capital city of Canberra, where over a hundred persons spent a combined holiday with intense Jewish and Hebrew studies.

A grave problem of survival is faced by the outlying communities, the several thousand Jews living in Perth, Brisbane, and Adelaide. Those interested in Jewish life veer to the larger centers, denuding their communities and rendering the efforts to improve religious amenities even more difficult.

Without exception, Jews in the smaller centers live apart, coming together only on special occasions. They lack the corporate communal life so facilitated by physical proximity and concentration, as in Melbourne or Sydney. Some efforts are being attempted. The 2600 Jews of Perth, for example, have succeeded in creating their own Jewish primary school.

One kind of Jewish commitment looms large in all communities, both large and small, and that is the participation in the United Israel Appeal. The federal and local Zionist organizations concentrate most of their efforts on fund-raising and continually widening the circle of donors. Indeed, there is no time of the year when some appeal is not under way. In Melbourne all the eight day-schools have their appeal months, for the state gives no aid. Mount Scopus College regularly imports a world-renowned Jewish speaker to help raise funds. But all fund-raising gives way to the demands of the Israel Appeal.

Australia is a country of immigration and is making every effort to attract European immigrants in order to people its vast emptiness and strengthen its chance of survival as a white man's continent in an encroaching, overpopulated Asiatic world. There is no doubt that a trickle of Jews will continue to enter the country. Last year Israel made the highest contribution.

There are several thousand ex-Israelis in Melbourne and Sydney. Some British and South African Jews are also coming to Australia. But it would seem that there is little prospect of an intensely Jewish immigration. On the contrary, the average Jewish immigrant to Australia is not today usually of the sort that seeks out specifically Jewish amenities.

Added to this is the fact that Israel constitutes a serious attraction to individuals looking for a more satisfying and fuller Jewish life. Parents with strong Jewish convictions, whether primarily national or religious, send their daughters to Israel to find marriage partners.

The number of Jewish marriages celebrated in Australia as a whole has shown a steady decline since 1956. In the final resort, it is only a small circle of die-hards who are behind every activity of a Jewish nature, whether it be welfare, Zionist, Bnai Brith, or congregational. They have succeeded in Melbourne in creating a versatile and promising primary Jewish educational network.

The secondary level compares well with many other larger centers of Jewry, but is very much smaller in scope and, on the whole, unsatisfactory in achievement. The position is little short of disastrous in other communities; and everywhere the problem of personnel seems insuperable. Only the continued dispatch of Israeli teachers, youth leaders, and an occasional shochet and hazan enable the community to maintain its religious, cultural, and educational activities.

The only solution short of messianic ingathering in Israel would seem to be a long-term, heavily subsidized system of personnel-exchange, a Jewish "peace corps" radiating from Israel, but mobilizing young people from all parts of the Diaspora to spend several years in Australia, offering their services in key religious and educational positions.

HELENA RUBINSTEIN, WORLD COSMETICS TYCOON, LIVED TO 94, AMASSED RICHES

petitor. The two women immediately began an intense and much-publicized rivalry.

Miss Rubinstein never mentioned her competitor by name and they never met. She once told a close friend that she and Miss Arden had attended the same party but that their nervous hostess kept them in separate rooms.

"No one had the courage to bring us face to face," Miss Rubinstein said in what was described as a slightly wistful voice.

She soon switched her advertising from a social to a scientific key. By 1928 she decided to "slow down" and sold two-thirds of her business to Lehman Brothers, who planned to turn it into a low-priced, mass-distributed line.

Miss Rubinstein charged them $7.3 million for the privilege. But the Lehmans did not understand the business, and it began to fail even before the stock market crash.

Only one year later, Miss Rubinstein stepped out of semi-retirement and bought back control for $1.5 million. It was the greatest financial coup of her career.

Miss Rubinstein divorced her husband in 1938. She reportedly described him as "a very good writer who helped me with advertising."

Late that year she was married to Prince Artchill Gourielli-Tchkonka, a dapper, suave man who was nearly twenty years her junior. He was once described as "a man with a Benevenuto Cellini personality", says the New York Times. An acquaintance said that Prince Gourielli, a Georgian, taught his wife how to entertain and introduced her to international society.

Much of their married life was spent in their house in Paris on the Ile-St. Louis. Miss Rubinstein named a line of cosmetics after her husband but the products were discontinued several years after his death in 1955.

During the years of her marriage, Miss Rubinstein had seven museum-like homes: two in France; one in London; one in Mexico; one in Buenos Aires; one in New York; and one in Greenwich, Conn. She made the top floor of all of them showcases for her paintings.

"Bought in bulk," she used to say referring to her vast and varied collection of paintings, "I'm a merchant."

In her New York apartment, she had an English Squire Room; a Spanish dining room; a mid-Victorian room; a Georgian dining room; a Biedermeier room; a Dutch room; a Second Empire room; a Renaissance room; a Gay Nineties Room; an Early American sitting room; an Austrian kitchen; and a Queen Anne dining room.

There were collections of pink opalines in her bedroom and in the Dali room, which was exclusively reserved for the works of Salvador Dali.

The Helena Rubinstein Foundation, which she created in 1953, gave funds to organizations concerned with health, medical research, and the rehabilitation of children. It also supported the American-Israel Foundation and provided Israelis with art scholarships.

The foundation created a chemistry chair at Brandeis University and also provided a scholarship at Radcliffe College and at the Columbia School of General Studies.

Miss Rubinstein remained loyal to the first face cream that she made herself — it was originally called the Velaze Skin Purifying Cream and then became known as the "Wake-Up Cream."

"Madame could never remember the names of her best friends," an employe remarked, according to the New York Times, "but she never forgot the components of a single product that bore her name."
